

Food Depot¹ and its hundreds of employee owners are committed to providing choice and value to its customers, including those who purchase food through the assistance of government plans (such as women, infant and children in the WIC program) that have significant limitations on what they can buy. Food Depot stores currently offer 'cage free' eggs to the extent they are reasonably available in the marketplace, along with other USDA graded eggs. To the extent that its suppliers are able to meet customer demands, and that governmental assistance programs allow, Food Depot currently plans to transition to all 'cage free' eggs by 2025.
